This property also has decent populations of hogs that have expanded their range into Pasquotank County. A herd can double every four months. Rooting up the ground with their snouts and tusks, they create large, muddy wallows in an incessant search for food such as bird eggs, young mammals, wildflowers and grazing grasses used by other wildlife. Typically, feral hog populations are no more than domestic swine gone wild that over time get darker and grow longer hair and bigger tusks, said Evin Stanford, a state biologist. Herds have been documented in Bertie, Pasquotank, Camden and Currituck counties.

North Carolina has five hunting seasons: big game, small game and other seasons, mourning dove, waterfowl, and webless migratory game birds. Specific dates for each season varies by animal. For example, black bear season ranges from October 14 to January 1 depending on your geographic location in the state. Most hunting seasons run from mid fall to early spring.
