Location The Desert Peaks are located in the south-central portion of New Mexico in the Chihuahuan Desert. The northernmost of the Desert Peaks, the Sierra de las Uvas Mountains, are a low, volcanic range that formed over 10 million years ago. Magdalena Peak, the highest point in the range, is a lava dome that rises over 6,500 feet (1,981 m) above sea level. The Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument contains a wide variety of vegetative communities, including black grama grasslands, mixed cactus and desert shrubs, montane shrublands with sumac, stands of mountain mahogany, oak, pinyon, and juniper, and small pockets of ponderosa pine forest. These communities sustain a range of animal species. Hundreds of artifacts belonging to the Desert Archaic peoples and their descendants, which include the Mimbres Pueblo, Jornada Mongollon, and the Apache, have also been uncovered in the area. This includes rock cairns that mark the boundary of the Gadsden Purchase, a shallow cave once used as a hideout by Billy the Kid, Depression-era dams, and aircraft training targets used during World War II. The nearby Sierra de las Uvas Wilderness protects approximately 11,114 acres (4,498 ha) of land in the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument. Several Tribal Nations have left their mark on these volcanic mountains over the course of millennia. Several petroglyph sites are tucked into the Sierra de las Uvas Mountains. Located at the edge of the Chihuahuan Desert, Las Cruces is the second-largest city in New Mexico. The city is rich in history and is packed with cultural attractions including art galleries, museums, annual festivals, and theaters. Visitors to Las Cruces can also easily explore over 100 miles (161 km) of scenic hiking and biking trails on 500,000 acres (202,343 ha) of public land. While in the city, you can also check out several nearby parks, including White Sands National Park and the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument.
